

Here in the Detroit area, the current media ownership rules have increased the value of radio stations, but destroyed the value of owning a radio. We no longer have a choice, other than to choose a cassette player or a CD, if we want classical music, and the most intelligent talk on the radio is a semi-literate jock host discussing this Sunday's football game with an illiterate jock. I hope the FCC takes this opportunity to restore the competition of the intellectual marketplace instead of serving the anti-competitive short-sighted, monopolistic turkeys which have gobbled up Detroit radio. Happy Thanksgiving.
